Short Description

Everyone has felt the unpleasant zap of static electricity when walking across a carpet then touching a metal object. You jerk your hand away in reaction to the unexpected jolt, but don't give it much thought. However, if you're working on a PC, static electricity can be far more dangerous than a little shock. It can actually kill your computer! If you install a component while static electricity is coursing through your fingertips directly into your PC, even a little zap that you can't even feel, can put a fatal charge into your computer.
